A Mexican Carriage.

We extract the following description of a Mexican Don's carriage, from the "Twelve Months' Volunteer." The owner was Don RAMON PRIETO, a man of Spanish blood, who had travelled extensively in the United States January and England.

Ints oid carriage, of the kind used altogether in the interior, is worth a description, from its singular shape and appearance, and as it excited much curiosity in those who walked up to the casa grande, where it stood under the large piazza. The hind wheels were large and strong, about five and a half feet in diameter; the fore ones stout, but low, not being more than two and a half feet; the axles were both very heavy, as also was the high bolster on the fore one; two large pieces, looking like small timbers for a house, May: ran from the hind axle-trees to the bolster, and connected the two; two heavy uprights stood from the hind axle, and corresponding June: two from the bolster; these cross peices equally large, and carved; all this made the frame: stouter and heavier than that of any six July: horse wagon, larger also; for the width between the wheels or track, was about eight feet and a half, and from the fore axle to the August: hind one, between eleven and twelve feet. The reader can judge what a cumbrous frame this was; but the body supported by it, was september not larger than one of our common carriages, seating only six persons on the two seats; that passed, from the cross piece on the fore wheels before the carriage, and the hind ones as much behind it. The harness was cum- November: brous, heavy, loaded with brass, and had heavy coverings or bags for the tails of the mules. Seven were harnessed to the heavy December carriage: two at the wheels, then three abreast, then two more, with three riders along, there being no driver.
